Hey Richie – John Berylson – with Amy – now it's in print what I've been saying to you for weeks. New York Times – 'Home Building and US Tumbles – Amid Lockdown'. Home building and the US dropped a record 30.2% in April and permits for future construction tumbles underling fears that the virus would leave the deepest economic contraction in the sector since the Great Depression, etc, etc.

Job loss – 20.5 million jobs. Unprecedented. Richie – I'm right, I knew I was right. These guys get off this and they've got two years in the wilderness. They won't find long term jobs. They'll get on jobs that will end, they'll bid for jobs that will never happen, and it's time to rally up here and 'Okay, we're getting this done, we fix your price.' You're in the middle of this. You've gotta tell them to fk off, and Paul as well. People just aren't building houses. The only thing that's being done, are the things that started like us, years ago. No one is stupid enough, because I wouldn't have been stupid enough to start this now; starting projects that are sort of expensive because the guy that was going to build a 10 million dollar project, two years ago, doesn't have the 10 million dollars to spend on it today. Today that's a 7 million dollar project, at least, maybe even 6.

So, you know, I've been waiting on some proof of these numbers, and now they're in. All these subs or whatever... 'Oh yeah I can get jobs all over the place.' Well then they're too stupid to know that those aren't really jobs. They're short-term efforts, at best, the people go out bidding, because it's not getting done. For obviously considerably less smaller, for less money projects. And, I'm right. And I'm sure, given quality subs, Amy will switch one guy out for another when the time comes, if some guy doesn't hit reality and it's got nothing to do now with saving his job or else he can go apply to the federal government for welfare for about 3 months, and then he can start feeding his children Cheerios for dinner, breakfast, and lunch. Talk to you later, bye bye.
